Non-conformance to packaging, labeling* and shipping requirements negatively affects the bottom line. Penalties for noncompliance cost both the shipper and receiver millions of dollars annually. Additional costs are incurred when materials are rerouted or returned. Some companies will not trade with suppliers that cannot meet their labeling requirements.

In manufacturing, many companies have elaborate receiving operations that accept shipments into their inventories via bar code aided wireless terminals at receiving docks. Many others are in the process of developing such systems. Costly bottlenecks occur when these companies receive goods from their suppliers without proper or sufficient identification or with non-compliant identification. It has been estimated that the receiving function represents 2-10% of the cost of goods purchased.
